Section B: Comprehension and Usage

(50 marks)

Read the following extract carefully and answer ALL the questions that follow.

The extract below is adapted from the novel 'The Finisher' by David Baldacci. Vega Jane is told no one can leave Wormwood. Wormwood is inhabited by creatures called Wugs (humans) and it is ruled by Council. Wormwood is surrounded on all sides by a ring called the Quag (a scary place filled with beasts) where no Wug is ever believed to have set foot and come back alive. What lies beyond the Quag, nobody knows.

I was dozing when I heard the scream. It pierced my head like a mortar round, doing terribly befuddling things to my mind, as loud and terrifying as though it were all happening right there and then.

5 After the sound came the vision: the blue, the colour blue. It was in a mist like a cloud on the ground. It enveloped my mind, pushing out all other thoughts, all memories. When it finally disappeared, my befuddlement cleared as well. Yet I always believed there was something of great importance that had simply not come back to me.

10 I suddenly sat up straight on my planks atop my tree, the vision along with the sleepiness struck clean from me. At first light, I was almost always up in my tree – a stonking straight-to-the-sky poplar with a full towering canopy. Twenty short boards nailed to the trunk were my passage up. Eight wide, splintered boards constituted my floor when I got up there. And a stretch of waterproof cloth I had oiled myself draped over branches and tied down tight with scavenged rope represented my roof. But I was not thinking about that, for a scream was ringing in my ears and it wasn't the scream of 15 the blue mist, which apparently existed only in my mind. This scream was coming from down below.

I hurtled to the edge of my planks and looked down to the ground from where I heard the scream once more. The cry was now joined by the baying of attack canines. The sounds shattered what had been a peaceful first light.

20 I scampered down my tree. My booted feet hit the dirt, and I looked first right and then left. It was difficult to tell from where the screams and baying were coming from. Amid the trees, sounds echoed and bounced confusedly.

When I saw what was coming at me, I turned and started running as fast as I could. The attack canine had hurtled from out of a stand of trees, its fangs bared and its 25 hindquarters lathered in sweat, a testament to the effort it was employing.

I was fleet of foot for a female Wug, but there was no Wug, male or female, who could outrun an attack canine. Even as I ran, I braced for the impact of its fangs on my skin and bone. But it flashed past me, soon vanishing from sight. I was not its prey this light.

I glanced to the left and saw between two trees a glimpse of black – a black tunic.

30 Council was about. But for what reason? Council was comprised of males, most of them older Wugs, and they kept themselves to themselves. They passed laws and regulations that all Wugs must obey, but we all lived in peace and freedom, if not in much luxury.

35 I kept running, and soon realized that my path was taking me perilously close to the Quag. The Quag was an impenetrable barrier that circled Wormwood like a noose. That's all there was in existence: Wormwood and the Quag. No one had ever gone through the Quag because the terrible beasts in there would murder you in slivers. And since there was nothing beyond the Quag, there had never been visitors to Wormwood.

40 I neared the edge of this most terrible place that Wugs had been warned from a very young age to avoid. I slowed and then stopped a few yards from where the Quag began. My heart was pounding and my lungs bursting, not simply from running but from being this close to a place that held only death for those stupid enough to stray inside.

The baying had now ceased. I looked to the left and glimpsed canines and Council members staring into the depths of the Quag.

45 I let out one more long breath and that's when a sound to my right reached me. I looked in that direction and in a stunning moment realized I was seeing someone disappear into the tangled vines and twisted trees that rose up like a barricade around the perimeter of the Quag. And it was a Wug I knew well.

I wondered if I had imagined it. No Wug would voluntarily venture into that awful place.

50 When something touched me on my arm, I nearly screamed. I was about to collapse to the ground, but the thing, now revealed to be a hand, kept me upright.

'Vega Jane, isn't it?'

I turned to look into the blunt features of Jurik Krone. He was tall, strong, forty-five sessions old, and a fast-rising member of Council.

55 'What are you doing here?' he asked. His tone was not stern, simply questioning.

'I was in my tree. I heard a scream and saw the canines. I saw Wugs in black tunics running. So I ...ran too.'
